

The high achiever believes he has been able to achieve so much because he sets himself ambitious targets. Quamelle didn't find these languages because he had the passion for it. Anyone can do it as long as you have the passion. I love this paragraph because it is telling me if you want something badly you will get it as long as you try.

The multi-lingual genius will be studying chemistry and living things. Quamelle, who is currently volunteering at the Royal Free hospital as a word clerk. Natalie his mother arranged an exchange programme in which a young Japanese student spent a week with them in the UK. If that happened to me I will be very scared leaving my family behind.

Quamelle enjoyed the trip. It was a very different culturally which I found intriguing and very empowering to see how their society works. I like the fact about this article is that it is so interesting and based on what the title is about. Quamelle said he wants to be a "research scientist and will specialise the study of the family.

His mother Natalie, 41, told The Voice: "My son is clever and sure is travelling around the world without me. I can't keep up with him. He wins a lot of awards each year. He has risen above a number of obstacles and I am extremely proud of him. I think he would be great inspiration for other young readers to rise above the obstacles and create their own future. I like how he ~~rose~~ risen to the challenge.
