

Libyan government will be able to try and control this situation. Instead, private entities and the United Nations will have to try and control this urgent situation.

So, as Minister of Youth Affairs in my country, I will release advertisement campaigns about my country's situation. The campaign would be called 'Don't do it', and would expose the foreign recruitment firms, and making sure the government of my country wouldn't have any ties with them, make more job opportunities, and make the existing ones clearer (as there are many opportunities in Africa already), tell them the dangers of travelling by foot or sea, and how hard you have to work in the West to make it, as it is arguably harder to do it than Africa, in addition to telling the youth that 'We need you!', as my country, as well as any, can have a better tomorrow. I would teach these things in schools, have giant billboards detailing this, have it played on local television and radio stations, and strengthen the borders of my country. That is how I will ensure stability and security in my country.

The amount of hurdles these youth go through is pointless to me. If they want a good life, they have to put in hard work, and not the kind that will get your back broken. Only we can get a better tomorrow, as many governments do not want to be involved in Africa. This is a time that our youth have to come together, instead of break apart, to get to a better tomorrow.
